It also leaves the tribal conditions and the lands of the Indians as they exist. The area embraces 69,000 square miles, as large as Ohio and Indians together.

The census of 1830 gives the population of this area at 150,000, but since the census was taken there has been a large increase in population, owing to the opening of reservations last fail, and the population at this time is probably 275,000 or 300,000 white citizens. The census reports describe this region as unsurpassed in the western coal belt in the quality of its coal. Richardson in his book, "Beyond the Mississippi," twenty-five years ago described the Indian Territory as one of the richest in resources of mineral wealth and agricultural productiveness in the west and spoke of it as "one of the stars on our national emblem."

The proposed state is traversed by six railroads. The bill divides it into two federal judicial districts, the enstern comprising all the lands occupied, by the five nations, the western district all of the present Oklahoma territory. Provision is made to have the United States courts now held at Paris, Tex, and Fort Smith, Ark, held within the territory occupied by the five nations.

Senator Perkins of Kansas has introduced a bill authorizing the secretary of the interior, within ninety days after the passage of the act, to cause to be allotted to each and every member of the Quapaw tribe of Induans, now located in the northeastern part of the Inian Territory, upon lists being furnished him by the chief of the tribe, 200 acres of land out of their common reserve to each person entitled thereto. The bill sets apart 240 acres, on which the government school buildings now stand, and other tracts not exceeding 160 acres, for school, church and seminary purposes. The remaining sections of the bill prescribe the method of allotment and other details of procedure.
